Please note that the 17th century has been omitted, for the moment, because it is already available as the bibliography of our publication The Life and Families of 17th Century Langham.

However an updated version will be added to this document in due course.

Introduction

The intention of this list of possible sources is to provide starting points for researchers. Do not be put off by the length of the list: you will probably need only a fraction of it.

For the primary sources - original documents or transcriptions of these - efforts have been made to include everything which might be productive. If you know of or find further such sources which should be on this list, please tell the Langham Village History Group archivist so that they can be added. If you find a source that we have given particularly productive, please tell us what needs it has satisfied; if you are convinced that it is a waste of time, please tell us this too!

For the secondary sources - books, journals and internet sites - we have tried to include just enough useful ones, whatever aspect of Langham history that you might wish to investigate. However, we realise that there is then a danger of the list looking discouragingly long.

Probably you will want to look at only a fraction of these. For many of the books, just a single chapter or a small section found from the index, or even a sentence, here and there, useful for quotation, is all that you may want.

But, again, if you find or know of further especially useful sources, please tell us.

A final plea to all researchers: when you do find a useful fact or opinion or quotation, which you might one day want to pass on to others, please, please be sure to note the source. The minimum needed for any useful publication of historical research is:

- For primary sources (and unique secondary sources such as Ph.D. theses): the name of the archive; the reference number of the document; the page/folio number, if relevant.
- For books: the title; the author; the publisher or place of publication; the date of the actual edition used; the page number(s).
- For articles in journals: the title of the article; the author; the name of the journal; the serial number of the journal; the date of publication; the page number(s).
- For internet sites: the full site reference, from the bar at the top of the screen, and the date viewed.

Secondary sources

No attempt has been made, in the list below, to distinguish between works in which only a few pages or just one or two index entries may be found useful, and those which will merit thorough study. Some of the books recommended have been in bibliographies for many years and, although they may not represent the latest historical viewpoint, are included because many previous researchers have found them particularly helpful. The date of publication given is usually the date of a recent edition if there have been several.

The internet

The website www.copac.ac.uk is particularly useful for detecting the dates of first editions of books, if these are required, and also for finding which university libraries (but including also The British Library) have copies - but notice that not all universities are included yet and Leicester University is one that is not, apart from its 'Special Collection'. Bear in mind also that 60,000 books from the Library of Congress (and more from elsewhere) can be read on-line at www.archive.org !

There is an enormous number of additional sources accessible through the internet - so many, and of such varying quality and reliability, as to be confusing and discouraging. The Langham History Group Archivist can provide useful advice.

The site www.intute.ac.uk may be found especially helpful in identifying reliable sources. www.archiveshub.ac.uk is a national gateway to descriptions of archives in UK universities and colleges and www.history.ac.uk is well worth exploring. In particular, www.history.ac.uk/partners/bbih provides the Royal Historical Society Bibliography of British and Irish history.

There is a range of important research sources currently only available through institutions which have subscribed to them. Examples are the Oxford Dictionary of National Biography and JSTOR (short for Journal Storage, which archives academic journals) and EEBO (Early English Books Online). These can be used, free of charge, by members of certain group subscribers, notably those following a university course, but also by anyone prepared to sit in a British Library Reading Room.

The internet

The website www.copac.ac.uk is particularly useful for detecting the dates of first editions of books, if these are required, and also for finding which university libraries (but including also The British Library) have copies - but notice that not all universities are included yet and Leicester University is one that is not, apart from its 'Special Collection'. Bear in mind also that 60,000 books from the Library of Congress (and more from elsewhere) can be read on-line at www.archive.org !

There is an enormous number of additional sources accessible through the internet - so many, and of such varying quality and reliability, as to be confusing and discouraging. The Langham History Group Archivist can provide useful advice.

The site www.intute.ac.uk may be found especially helpful in identifying reliable sources. www.archiveshub.ac.uk is a national gateway to descriptions of archives in UK universities and colleges and www.history.ac.uk is well worth exploring. In particular, www.history.ac.uk/partners/bbih provides the Royal Historical Society Bibliography of British and Irish history.

There is a range of important research sources currently only available through institutions which have subscribed to them. Examples are the Oxford Dictionary of National Biography and JSTOR (short for Journal Storage, which archives academic journals) and EEBO (Early English Books Online). These can be used, free of charge, by members of certain group subscribers, notably those following a university course, but also by anyone prepared to sit in a British Library Reading Room.

The internet

The website www.copac.ac.uk is particularly useful for detecting the dates of first editions of books, if these are required, and also for finding which university libraries (but including also The British Library) have copies - but notice that not all universities are included yet and Leicester University is one that is not, apart from its 'Special Collection'. Bear in mind also that 60,000 books from the Library of Congress (and more from elsewhere) can be read on-line at www.archive.org !

There is an enormous number of additional sources accessible through the internet - so many, and of such varying quality and reliability, as to be confusing and discouraging. The Langham History Group Archivist can provide useful advice.

The site www.intute.ac.uk may be found especially helpful in identifying reliable sources. www.archiveshub.ac.uk is a national gateway to descriptions of archives in UK universities and colleges and www.history.ac.uk is well worth exploring. In particular, www.history.ac.uk/partners/bbih provides the Royal Historical Society Bibliography of British and Irish history.

There is a range of important research sources currently only available through institutions which have subscribed to them. Examples are the Oxford Dictionary of National Biography and JSTOR (short for Journal Storage, which archives academic journals) and EEBO (Early English Books Online). These can be used, free of charge, by members of certain group subscribers, notably those following a university course, but also by anyone prepared to sit in a British Library Reading Room.

The ongoing (for the last 30-40 years) reorganization, reclassification, etc. of the archives continues to result in periodical changes to classification: the following list uses references acceptable in 2010 but researchers are advised to start by looking again at the current version of the catalogue before trying to order documents, using the following as a check-list. Many listed items are inadequately described so that some may well be found not relevant when investigated.

There is a large range of transcribed sources relating to Lincoln diocese published by Boydell & Brewer Ltd., which are worth investigating for references to Langham. An example is:

Visitations in the Diocese of Lincoln, 1517-1531

In general, the Registrum antiquissimum of the cathedral church of Lincoln, published by the Lincoln Record Society, should be investigated.

Secondary sources

No attempt has been made, in the list below, to distinguish between works in which only a few pages or just one or two index entries may be found useful, and those which will merit thorough study. Some of the books recommended have been in bibliographies for many years and, although they may not represent the latest historical viewpoint, are included because many previous researchers have found them particularly helpful. The date of publication given is usually the date of a recent edition if there have been several.

The website www.copac.ac.uk is particularly useful for detecting the dates of first editions of books, if these are required, and also for finding which university libraries (but including also The British Library) have copies - but notice that not all universities are included yet and Leicester University is one that is not, apart from its 'Special Collection'. Bear in mind also that 60,000 books from the Library of Congress (and more from elsewhere) can be read on-line at www.archive.org !

There is an enormous number of additional sources accessible through the internet - so many, and of such varying quality and reliability, as to be confusing and discouraging. The Langham History Group Archivist can provide useful advice.

The site www.intute.ac.uk may be found especially helpful in identifying reliable sources. www.archiveshub.ac.uk is a national gateway to descriptions of archives in UK universities and colleges and www.history.ac.uk is well worth exploring. In particular, www.history.ac.uk/partners/bbih provides the Royal Historical Society Bibliography of British and Irish history.

There is a range of important research sources currently only available through institutions which have subscribed to them. Examples are the Oxford Dictionary of National Biography and JSTOR (short for Journal Storage, which archives academic journals) and EEBO (Early English Books Online). These can be used, free of charge, by members of certain group subscribers, notably those following a university course, but also by anyone prepared to sit in a British Library Reading Room.

Secondary sources

No attempt has been made, in the list below, to distinguish between works in which only a few pages or just one or two index entries may be found useful, and those which will merit thorough study. Some of the books recommended have been in bibliographies for many years and, although they may not represent the latest historical viewpoint, are included because many previous researchers have found them particularly helpful. The date of publication given is usually the date of a recent edition if there have been several.

The website www.copac.ac.uk is particularly useful for detecting the dates of first editions of books, if these are required, and also for finding which university libraries (but including also The British Library) have copies - but notice that not all universities are included yet and Leicester University is one that is not, apart from its 'Special Collection'. Bear in mind also that 60,000 books from the Library of Congress (and more from elsewhere) can be read on-line at www.archive.org !

There is an enormous number of additional sources accessible through the internet - so many, and of such varying quality and reliability, as to be confusing and discouraging. The Langham History Group Archivist can provide useful advice.

The site www.intute.ac.uk may be found especially helpful in identifying reliable sources. www.archiveshub.ac.uk is a national gateway to descriptions of archives in UK universities and colleges and www.history.ac.uk is well worth exploring. In particular, www.history.ac.uk/partners/bbih provides the Royal Historical Society Bibliography of British and Irish history.

There is a range of important research sources currently only available through institutions which have subscribed to them. Examples are the Oxford Dictionary of National Biography and JSTOR (short for Journal Storage, which archives academic journals) and EEBO (Early English Books Online). These can be used, free of charge, by members of certain group subscribers, notably those following a university course, but also by anyone prepared to sit in a British Library Reading Room.

Secondary sources

No attempt has been made, in the list below, to distinguish between works in which only a few pages or just one or two index entries may be found useful, and those which will merit thorough study. Some of the books recommended have been in bibliographies for many years and, although they may not represent the latest historical viewpoint, are included because many previous researchers have found them particularly helpful. The date of publication given is usually the date of a recent edition if there have been several.

The website www.copac.ac.uk is particularly useful for detecting the dates of first editions of books, if these are required, and also for finding which university libraries (but including also The British Library) have copies - but notice that not all universities are included yet and Leicester University is one that is not, apart from its 'Special Collection'. Bear in mind also that 60,000 books from the Library of Congress (and more from elsewhere) can be read on-line at www.archive.org !

There is an enormous number of additional sources accessible through the internet - so many, and of such varying quality and reliability, as to be confusing and discouraging. The Langham History Group Archivist can provide useful advice.

The site www.intute.ac.uk may be found especially helpful in identifying reliable sources. www.archiveshub.ac.uk is a national gateway to descriptions of archives in UK universities and colleges and www.history.ac.uk is well worth exploring. In particular, www.history.ac.uk/partners/bbih provides the Royal Historical Society Bibliography of British and Irish history.

There is a range of important research sources currently only available through institutions which have subscribed to them. Examples are the Oxford Dictionary of National Biography and JSTOR (short for Journal Storage, which archives academic journals) and EEBO (Early English Books Online). These can be used, free of charge, by members of certain group subscribers, notably those following a university course, but also by anyone prepared to sit in a British Library Reading Room.
